

Use of Essential Oils in Cancer Care (Workshop) Jan 26-27 2009 - London

The Use of Essential Oils in the Cancer Care Environment

Aromatherapy is one of the most commonly used complementary therapy interventions in the oncology and palliative care environment. Currently the majority of work is focused on whole person care, providing relaxation, improving coping skills and generally improving quality of life. The additional potential of essential oils to assist with specific clinical problems is enormous; their versatility lends them to be used in a variety of ways in this specialised environment.

This class is geared for those already working with essential oils and aromatherapy in the cancer care environment. Its purpose is to promote discussion, link essential oil research to sound and effective practice and improve aromatic interventions for persons with cancer. It also encourages the practitioner to explore the possibility of extending their current ways of working with essential oils to make full use of their therapeutic potential.

Date: January 26th - 27th, 2009

Venue: Marsden Hospital, London, UK

For bookings, contact: jeannie.dyer@rmh.nhs.uk